PLAYBOY'S COLLEGE GIRLS

From Berkeley's tower to Harvard's quad, PLAYBOY photographers have covered major campuses across the country. When the lens cover comes off, the noise level usually goes up. It is as inevitable as the dawn: news of PLAYBOY doing a "Girls of" feature will cause uproars of various kinds. Fortunately, we have coeds who are not easily intimidated.

In this collection, we present a retrospective look at some great student bodies, beginning with Berkeley's Heather Campbell on the previous page and the triple threat you see here: from left, Suzanne Birket, Kirsten Reed and Wanelle Fitch, all from USC.

Some of these girls became Playmates of the Month—Martha Thomsen, Pamela Jean Bryant, Candy Loving, Victoria Cooke; others became doctors, lawyers or just about any kind of professional you can think of. But here you see them the way they were.

GIRLS OF THE PAC 10

Anyone who's been to college knows the best things usually happen outside the classroom. These dorm shots prove the point: at left, Candace Breed of UCLA; right, Ali Duerr, University of California at Berkeley; below, Anne Healy of the University of Oregon.

One never knows just what a college education might lead to. Take Victoria Cooke, for instance. A University of Arizona coed when we first focused our lens on her, Victoria was one of the Girls of the Pac 10 pictorial (October 1978). Her next PLAYBOY appearance occurred in August 1980—as Playmate of the Month.

West Coast coeds, like the UCLA quartet above, have made a studied procedure of hitting the beach: from left, Lynda Sun, Nancy Carrol, Gigi Stirnkorb and Julie Carlson. But sometimes it's necessary to hit the books, as demonstrated by the University of Oregon's Sonja Nelson (left) and Berkeley's May Lee (below).

Most college students pull an all-nighter once in a while. Christine Kurriger of the University of Washington seems to have given up her attempt on this occasion.

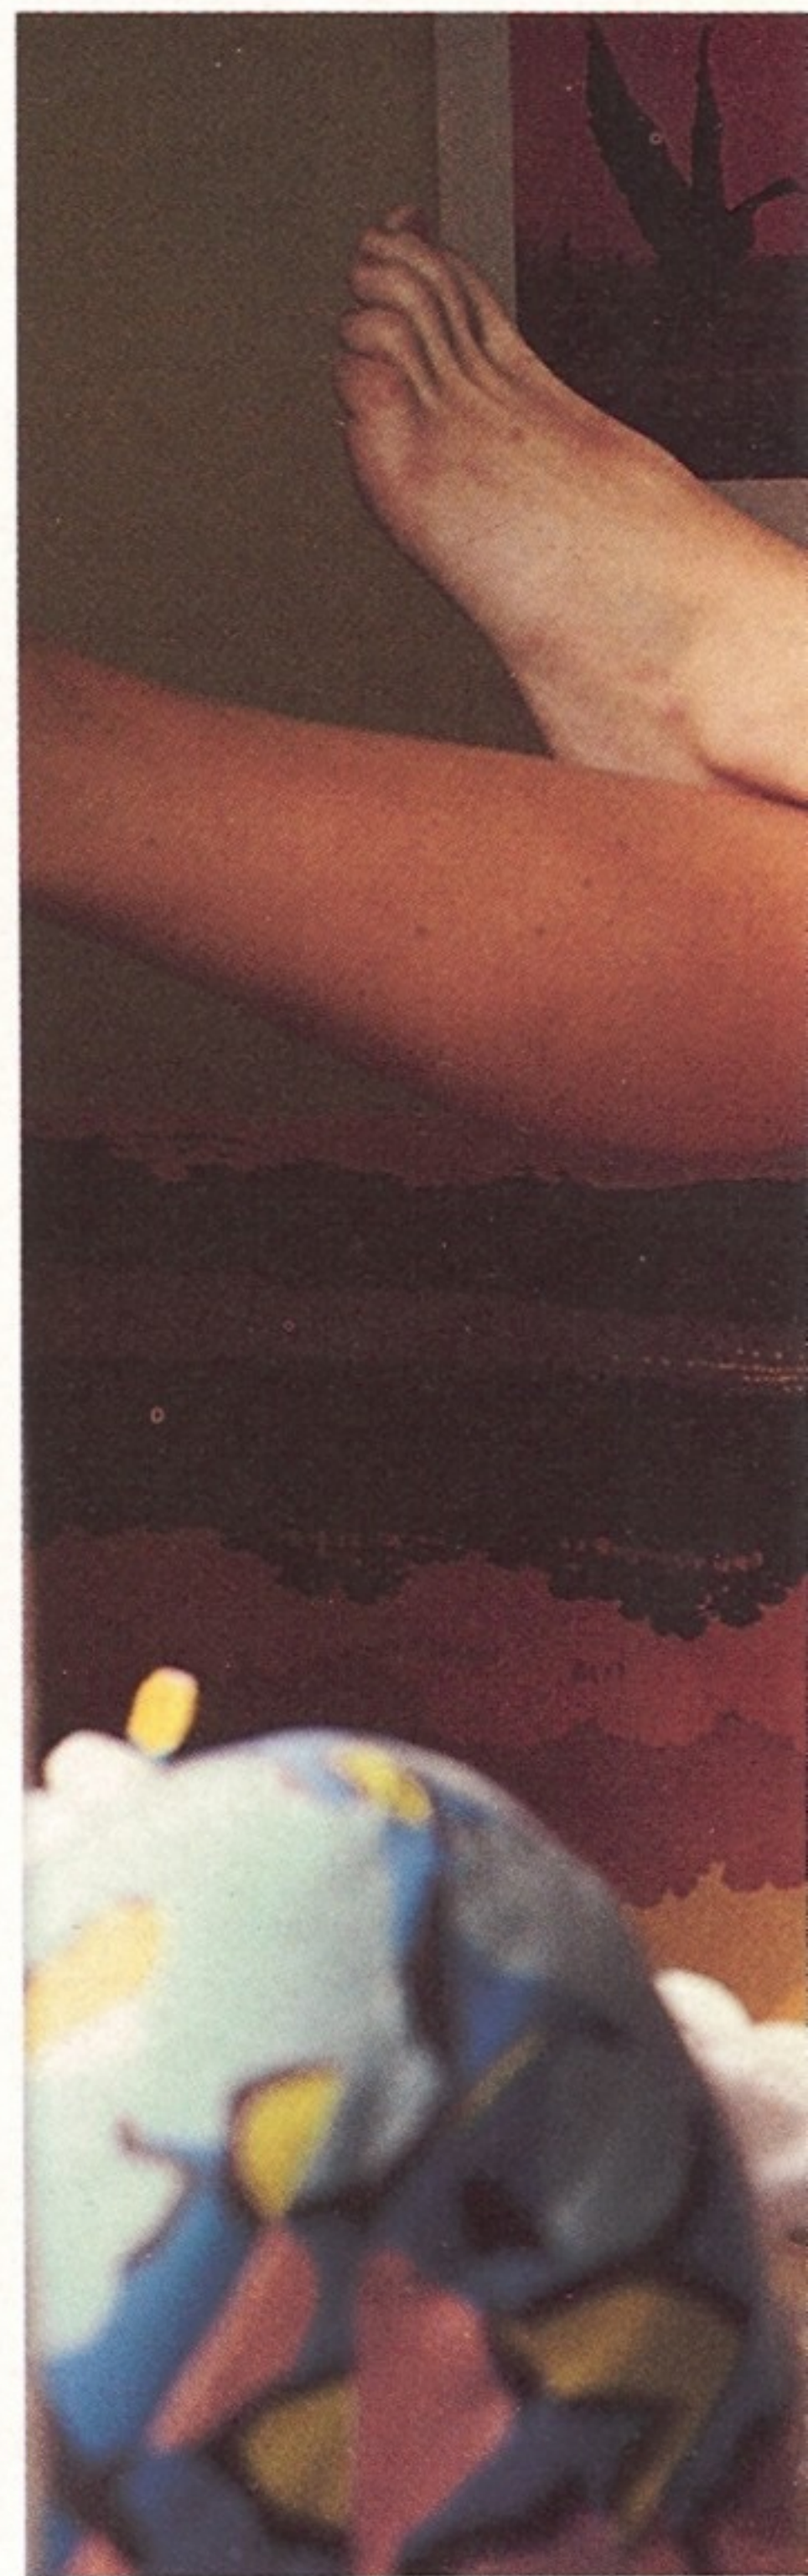

Arizona State's Renee DuBois (above) was a music-therapy major whose extracurricular activities included ballet and piano. Below, Pamela Kiser of the University of Washington definitely does not have the look of a student calling home for money. In wading boots at right, University of Oregon outdoor woman Vicki Sponhauer.

USC's Lisa Lewis (left) was a bat girl for the school's varsity baseball team and wanted to get into the fashion business. Laurel Haniman of Stanford (below) aspired to a career that involved lots of travel.

Stanford University often is named the most beautiful campus in the country. Political science major Renee Masi (above) may be one of the reasons. Making equally impressive arguments for their schools were Oregon State's Sarah Henry (below), a psych major, and Nancy Amons (right), a broadcast-journalism major at USC.

When she was a student at Washington State University, Martha Thomsen posed fully clothed for Girls of the Pac 10 and said she wanted to be an astronaut. She was working as an Eastern Airlines flight attendant when she became Playmate of the Month in May 1980.

University of Arizona coed Paulette Spirit took time out from her academic pursuits to pore over the Sunday funnies. Paulette's post-graduate goal was to have her own business.

GIRLS OF THE SOUTHWEST CONFERENCE

Wouldn't you know you were in Texas if you saw a case of beer called Lone Star? Cheryl Carlson (top) and Dana McConnell are a couple of stars from the University of Texas. Above, another U of T student, marketing major Carla McClain. Below, a future lawyer from Texas Tech, Jodie Fisher.

She may have been an Aggie, but Texas A & M's Penny Baker (left) claimed she rode English saddle. She also rode the porch swing quite well. Above, a beguiling smile from Teresa Campsey of Texas Tech.

Like most collegians, Beverly Banks of Texas Christian University (above) found time to horse around. Below, University of Texas' Carla McClain put up a good front. For another view, see page 29.

Laura Squair of the University of Arkansas (above) got some on-the-job-training; she wanted to become a sportswriter. Below, Vanessa Buchanan, U of T, was looking for a man secure enough to go hunting with her. Right: Anne Brinkmann, University of Houston.

Texas Tech coed Dee Dockray told us she hated to fail and that she liked her suitors to have class and muscles. The line forms on the right, guys.

Giving credence to the adage that college broadens horizons are the equally arresting styles of the University of Arkansas' Nesa Strong (above) and the University of Texas' Cynthia Latson (right). Nesa was passionate about art and skinny-dipping; Cynthia danced ballet, but listened to Lou Reed and David Bowie.

Southern Methodist's Stacie Beggs (below) was a student of fashion design. After her stint at Texas A & M, Brenda Kepner (right) wanted a modeling career. The reflective Suzanne Schneider (far right) was born in Heidelberg, West Germany, and attended Rice University.

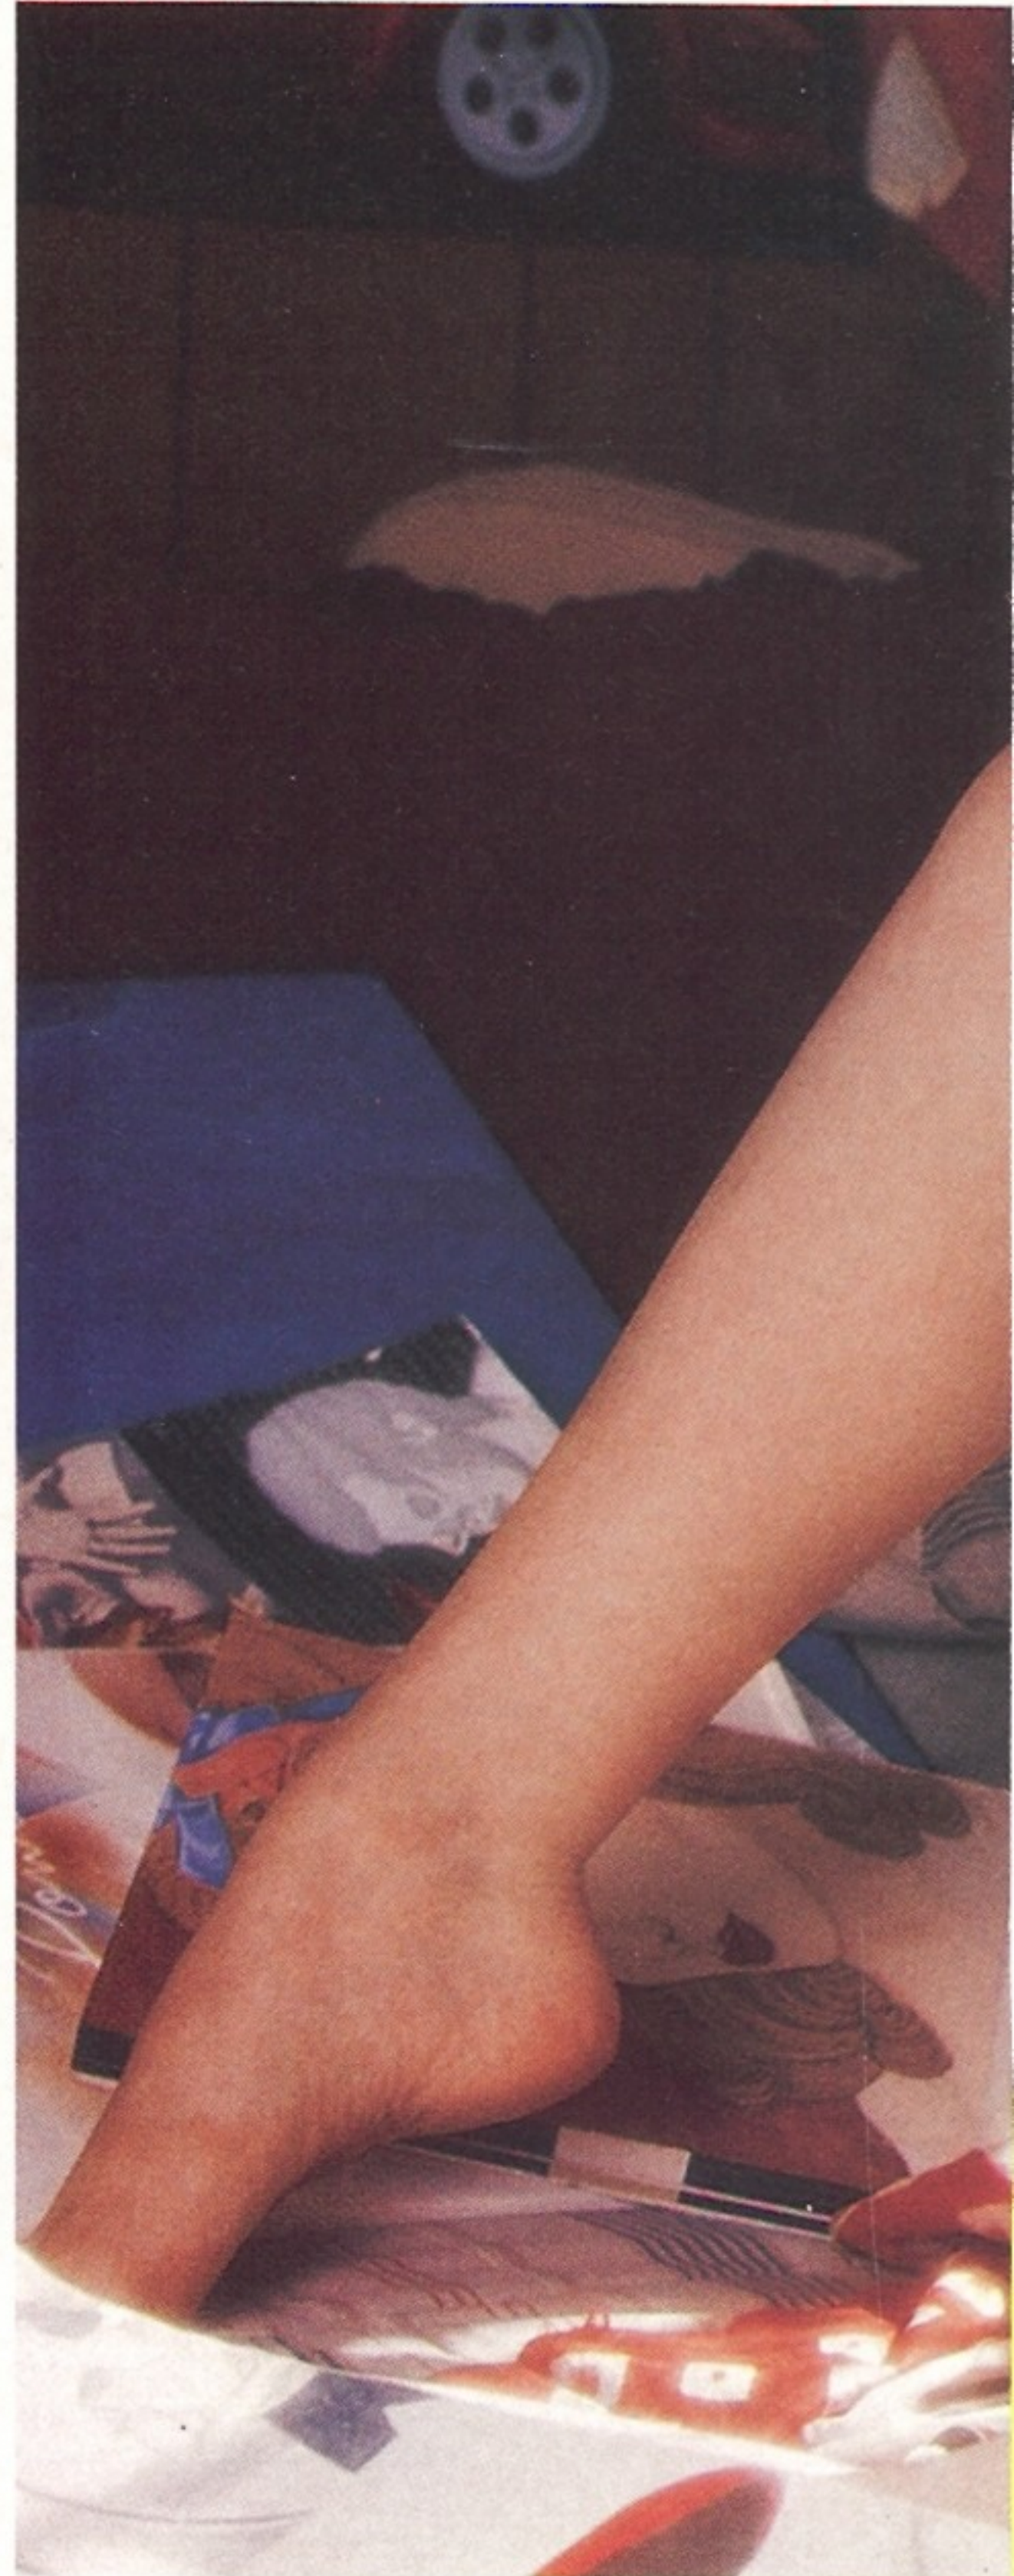

GIRLS OF THE BIG EIGHT

Finding time for fun doesn't seem to have been a problem for these overachievers. Above, Allison Klote (left) and Linda Kay Kollmeyer took time out from a jeep ride around the University of Missouri campus. At left, Shelly Potter of the University of Kansas.

Candy Loving was a public relations major at the University of Oklahoma when we discovered her during the Great Playmate Hunt. She became PLAYBOY's 25th Anniversary Playmate and spent a year making promotional appearances. Candy was on her way to becoming a top model but, instead, returned to OU for her degree. You see the end of that story at left.

Lambent-eyed Angela DeLozier was selected Miss Teen Oklahoma before she became a student at the University of Oklahoma.

You might call the festivity at right a New Age panty raid. That's a University of Kansas crowd at an off-campus male strip show. Below: sleepy Sandy Redmond of Iowa State. Bottom: the University of Oklahoma's Pegi McGuire helped a bunch of fraternity fellows wash their car. At right: Pamela Veach of Kansas State, who liked to belly dance, wrestle, pump iron and practice karate.

Annette Reiss sun-bathed on the roof of a fraternity house at the University of Missouri. Suzanne DeClue (top right) was also a Missouri coed. She liked riding, running, aerobics and photography, but aimed at becoming a teacher. At bottom right, the University of Colorado's Claudia Grassi skied whenever she could.

The scenery at the University of Colorado is magnificent. For proof, we offer Jesse Austin (left).
Art major Christine Davis (above) is also picture perfect. She was a student at the University of Kansas.

Owning her own cosmetics business was the post-graduation aim of Beth Krekel, an ambitious University of Missouri student, who said her main dislike was "not having money."

Amid amber waves of grain, Shannon Westbrooke posed in a field near her Kansas State campus. Below, another Kansan, Cara Anderson of KU. Right, the University of Colorado's Kelly Fallon.

GIRLS OF THE BIG TEN

The high flying Iowa Hawkeye cheerleaders above are Lisa Van Slyke (left) and Laura Dunscombe. Top right: Grace Packard, University of Michigan, hated plastic. She feared that future archeologists will uncover our culture and think Ronald McDonald was a god. Northwestern's Melissa Ann Rudel (bottom right) has worked as an exercise girl at Belmont Park. Next spread: Iowa's Kathryn Sue Benson wanted to join the U.S. Equestrian Team.

Caprice Wolfer (left) attended the University of Michigan and hoped to become a lawyer. Iowa's Susan Johnson (above) liked riding and worked in an emergency room. Future real estate maven Sandy Bires of Ohio State (below) loved driving; she had visited 43 states.

When Pamela Jean Bryant first appeared in front of PLAYBOY's camera, she was a telecommunications and film production major at Indiana University. But she's the kind of girl you don't easily forget; a few months later, we gave her centerfold attention as the April 1978 Playmate of the Month.

Indiana's Sylvia Jean
Hogan, headed for Med school, played piano.

Ohio State's Caroline Csur, above, spent most of her time writing, singing and playing guitar. Below left: Nicole La Nelle of the University of Wisconsin was a part-time bartender. Below right: Gorgeous Gopher Anita Kirchner liked "men with romantic eyes."
Right: Cynthia Benedict of Illinois modeled while preparing for a future in interior design.

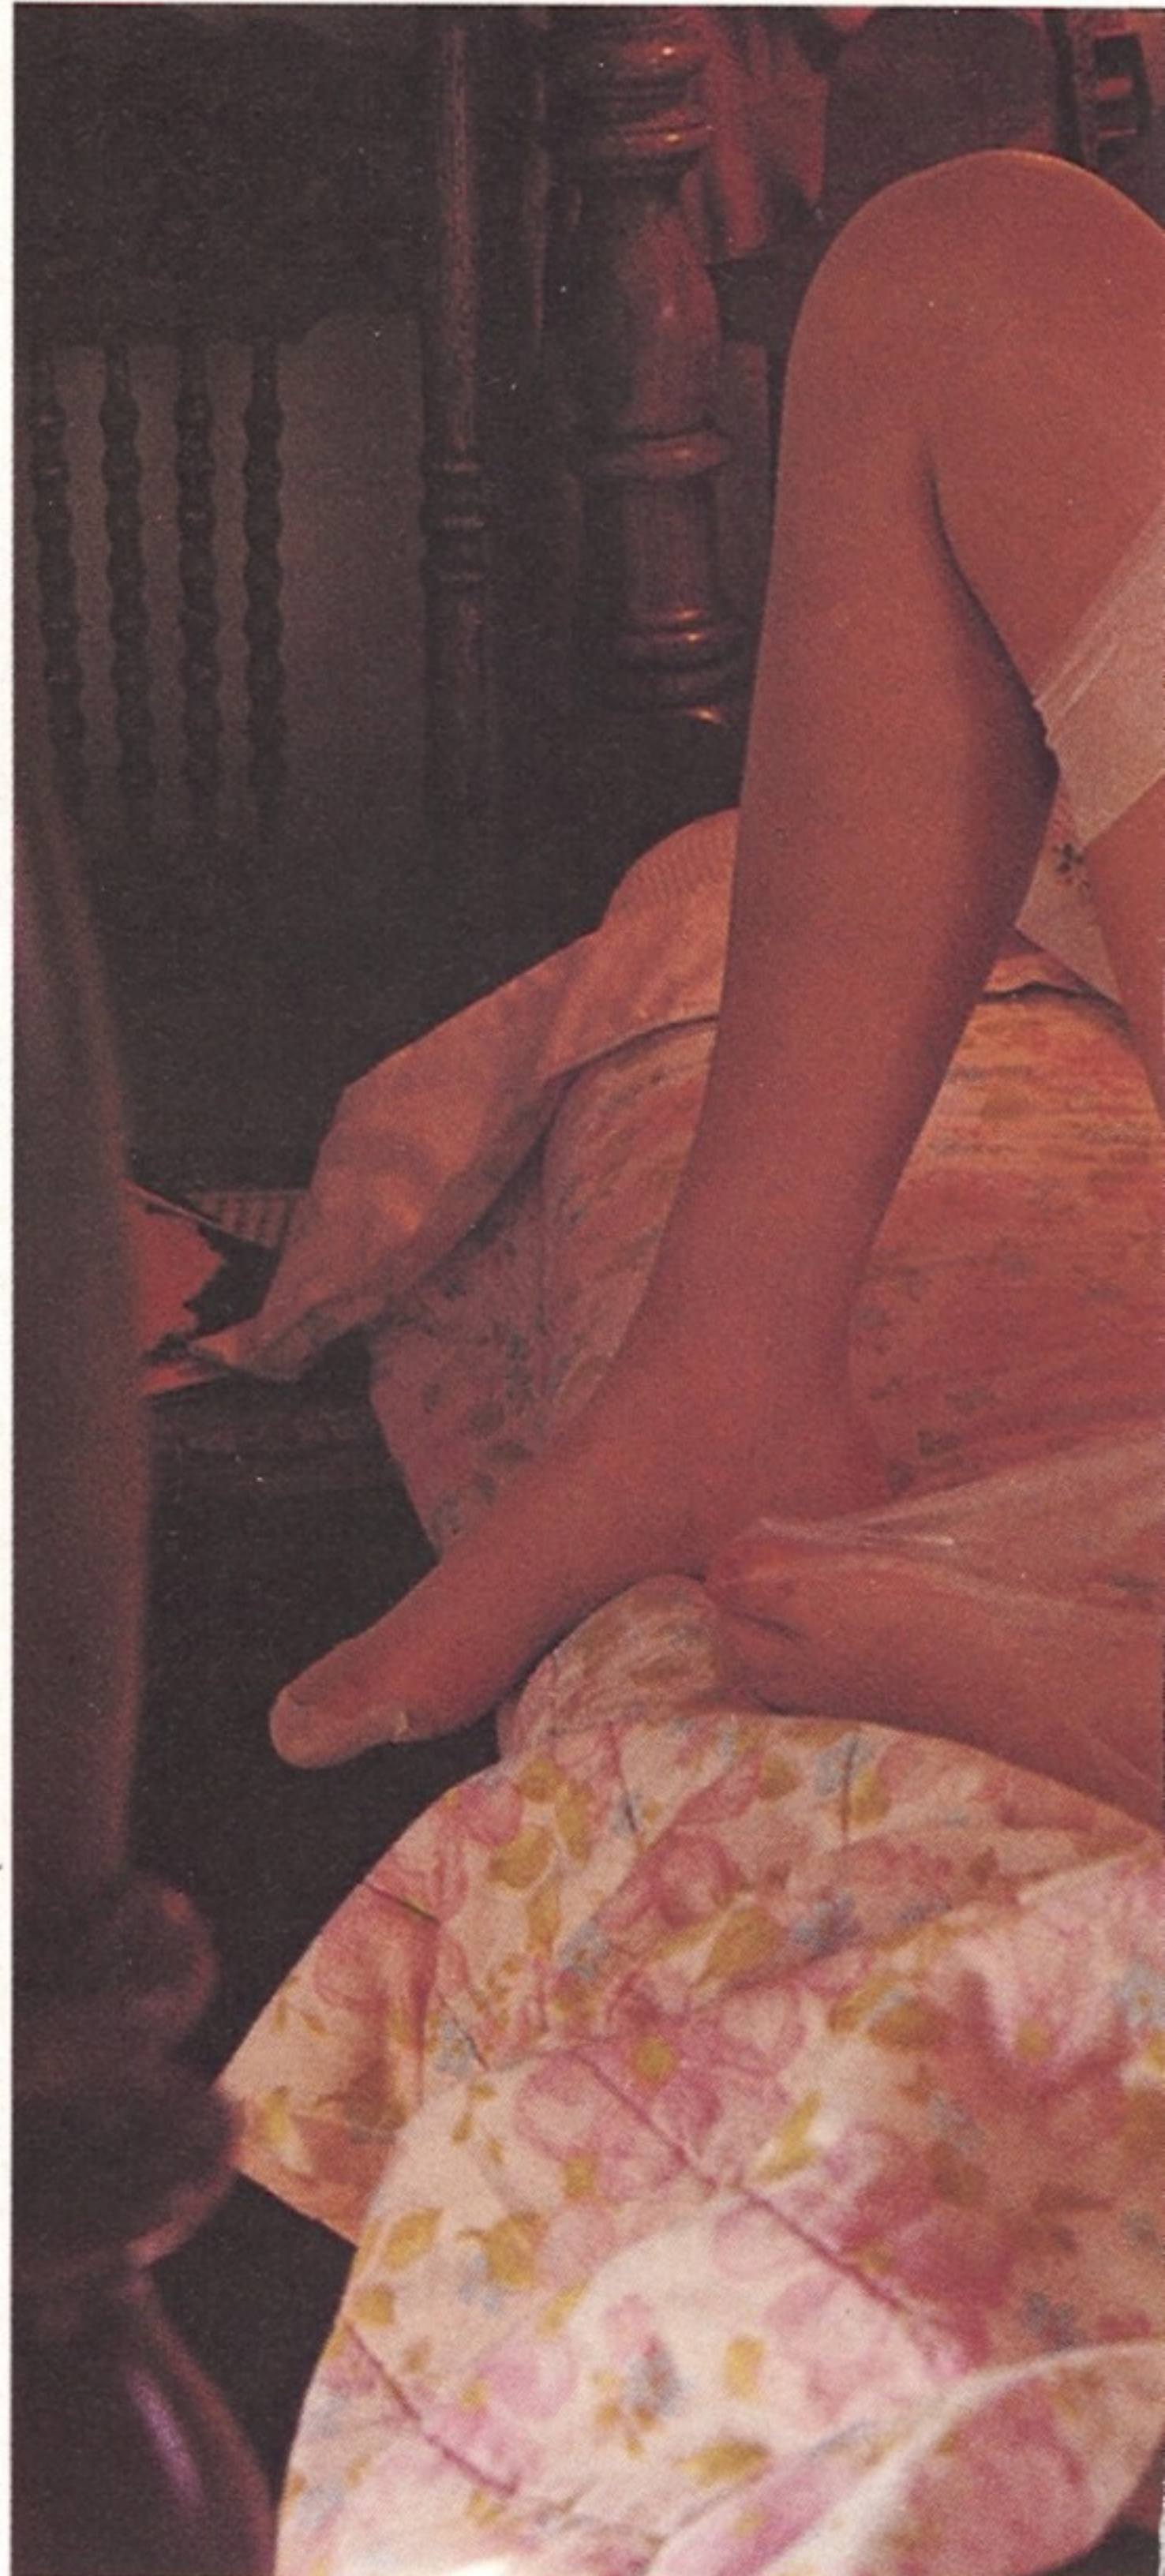

Susan Morton, below left, was a communications student at Purdue. Minnesotan Sheila Grogan (center) believed in sound minds and bodies; she planned to earn a Ph.D. in clinical psychology and for recreation enjoyed gymnastics and tennis. Barbara Dell (far right) studied journalism at Wisconsin; she wanted to be a free-lance writer.

Eliana Lobo of Brown confessed frankly that she posed "because I wanted
Brown to be able to show
it has really pretty girls."
The lady made her point eloquently.

Brown University's Hillary Clayson (far left) majored in classics. Robyn Ewing, number two at left, made her mark on Cornell's lacrosse squad. Her schoolmate, Lisa Jackson (below), distinguished herself in PLAYBOY by saying, "If people want to look at my body and I'm getting paid for it, that's OK."

GIRLS OF THE SOUTHEASTERN CONFERENCE

The belles above appear to be waiting for Ashley and Rhett to return from the war; Tawana Sharp and Kimberly Lasseter were really waiting for their degrees from Mississippi State. Below: the University of Georgia's Candy Howell; right: Tennessee's Crystal McTaggart.

Louisiana State University Tigress Holly Kelly steamed away an afternoon at a Baton Rouge health spa. Holly's ambition was to be in PLAYBOY. We're pleased that she realized her goal.

Future photographer Jamie Kapeghian (above) was a transplant at Ole Miss—her roots are up north in Michigan. Said Jamie: "I'm proud to be a Yankee." Julie Gayle (left) only looked at home in front of the hearth; the University of Kentuckian aimed for a business career.

Despite the balmy temperatures of the Southeastern Conference campuses, indoor sports had appeal for University of Alabama's Mary Landreth (above) and Kelly Alexander of Mississippi State (below). At right: Juliana van Mierop attended the University of Florida and was dedicated to beach volleyball.

Tennessee's Carolyn Arnold always kept her skis nearby. She had creative career plans: first, she'd find a job in textile science, then she'd take off for the slopes from October til March.

Yoga and a future in selling ornamental flora were important to the University of Florida's Joan Villarosa (above). Vanderbilt's Marlene Hall (right) was headed for a career in marine ethology. When you find out what that is, check out Victor Hugo, a Hall favorite.

Alabama's Carol Darsey (above) made a charming Rapunzel of the woods. Gina Todd (right) had no fear of flying. She studied aviation while a student at the University of Mississippi and was intent on earning a pilot's license.

One last look at our dreamy young miss from Ole Miss, Gina Todd. On the next page: Punnie Brittain of the University of Georgia, who was turned off by "men who snore or stagger." Punnie will certainly keep Georgia on your mind. We think you'll have a hard time forgetting any of these campus beauties.
